This book presents an application design that provides public goods and services. The application does not help the government provide the public goods; the intent is to replace the government. The application allows us to start building roads, and anything else, without the government. At least, the executive branch of the government is replaced. The application is a mass bargaining system for trading public goods and services. The application takes the place of the intermediary between the individuals and the firms. The individual send messages with their demands to the application, while the firms supply the projects. The people give their money to the application, the application gives their money to the private companies. The book starts with the explanation of the economic problem behind the scenes and what is the field in economics that addresses such a problem. Then, the author explains how to apply that economic theory and how it works, the model and the algorithms are derived from scratch. Next, the implementation is discussed. The pseudo-code is fully specified with the support of diagrams. Finally, the key characteristics of the model are analyzed for a conclusion. The complexity is broken by feature, each chapter specifies a feature. The segregation of features allows the partial implementation. The complexity of the book is self-contained and increases smoothly, it just depends on previous chapters, not on any external source. This book can be read by anyone with a background in mathematics.
